Alger On The Money

AI is No Longer a Buzzword

Artificial intelligence (AI) is broadening beyond early adopters and into the fabric of corporate strategy. One measure of that shift: how often executives are discussing AI on earnings calls, the forum where management lays out its priorities and outlook. When a majority of S&P 500 companies mention a technology in that setting, it is no longer a talking point – it is becoming a strategic imperative, in our view. What are the implications for investors?

S&P 500 Companies Citing AI in Earnings Calls

Source: FactSet and S&P Global, as of March 12, 2026.

- In the chart above, a record 331 S&P 500 companies cited AI on their fourth-quarter 2025 earnings calls, representing 68% of all calls conducted during the period. That figure is 33% higher than a year ago and has risen nearly 4x over the past three years since the advent of ChatGPT – a dramatic acceleration in how broadly AI has entered corporate strategy discussions.
- This broadening is evident at the sector level. Financials and Information Technology led in absolute terms, each with 67 calls citing AI, while Health Care recorded the largest quarter-over-quarter increase.
- In our view, companies enabling or successfully adopting AI into their operations may be well positioned to benefit from this shift. The market data supports that view: according to FactSet, S&P 500 companies citing AI on earnings calls have seen average price appreciation more than double that of non-citers from March 31, 2025 through March 10, 2026.[1] With the AI infrastructure buildout spanning semiconductors, data centers, and networking continuing to attract capital at a historic pace, we believe the investment case for AI is strengthening as the technology moves from experimentation to execution.

Risk Disclosures: Investing in the stock market involves risks, including the potential loss of principal. Growth stocks may be more volatile than other stocks as their prices tend to be higher in relation to their companies' earnings and may be more sensitive to market, political, and economic developments. Past performance is not indicative of future performance. Investors whose reference currency differs from that in which the underlying assets are invested may be subject to exchange rate movements that alter the value of their investments. Companies involved in, or exposed to, AI-related businesses may have limited product lines, markets, financial resources or personnel as they face intense competition and potentially rapid product obsolescence, and many depend significantly on retaining and growing their consumer base. These companies may be substantially exposed to the market and business risks of other industries or sectors, and may be adversely affected by negative developments impacting those companies, industries or sectors, as well as by loss or impairment of intellectual property rights or misappropriation of their technology. Companies that utilize AI could face reputational harm, competitive harm, and legal liability, and/or an adverse effect on business operations as content, analyses, or recommendations that AI applications produce may be deficient, inaccurate, biased, misleading or incomplete, may lead to errors, and may be used in negligent or criminal ways. AI technology could face increasing regulatory scrutiny in the future, which may limit the development of this technology and impede the future growth. AI companies, especially smaller companies, tend to be more volatile than companies that do not rely heavily on technology.
